I'm going to disagree with most of the posts here.

If your colleague was leading the project, then it was up to him to have a timeline and determine all the resources that he needed. If he found that he hadn't prepared well enough, or if something unexpected came up, then asking for the help of team members would have become necessary.

However, if you ask for help, and someone tells you they are available, but you don't take the initiative to find them the next day – you are at fault. There are repercussions to not following through.

If I was in your shoes, and there are things that I had to do, I would have politely told them that my available time was yesterday – not now. I now have other things to take care of and don't have any available time today. By setting boundaries like this, you encourage people to respect your time and input.
